

My personal values

Big things happen with small decisions and great welfare starts with small acts of kindness. But anything big or small and good or bad has one common thing in it. It is the values carried by the people involved in the situation. They are there, no matter if a person is aware of them or not. Moreover, everybody is driven by their personal values shaped by their characteristics and behavior, and only that thing decides how far they can go in their life and career. That means values are very important.

For me, honesty, kindness, and truth are the essential values for humans that play an important role in developing other values. They are present in my life from my childhood, but there are several moments in the past when I overlooked them for a short gain or comfort. However, I am thankful for the negative results that came up later and taught me the lessons thereby strengthening my values.

As far as the values are concerned, introspection goes a long way in identifying and cultivating them. I used to be very rude to others weaker or occupying lower positions, but I realized this when others in a superior position behaved badly with me. There were multiple incidents when I got to see myself going through the same humiliating situation. As a result, I learned the value of kindness that has helped me have good people and beautiful relationships in my life.